Many people and institutions have supported me in the process of realizing this book. Gerti Seiser first sparked my interest in socio-cultural anthropology and later encouraged me to pursue an academic career. The book's foundation was laid during my time at the Department of Social and Cultural Anthropology at the University of Vienna, and it took its final shape at the Department of Science, Technology and Society Studies at the University of Klagenfurt. My ethnographic fieldwork in China between 2013 and 2015 was supported by the University of Vienna and a Marietta Blau Grant of the Austrian Agency for International Mobility and Cooperation in Education, Science and Research (OeAD), funded by the Austrian Federal Ministry of Science, Research and Economy (BMWFW). The Chinese Scholarship Council (CSC) facilitated my affiliation with Renmin University of China.

Matthew Hale and Alexander Day introduced me to participants in the New Rural Reconstruction Movement. Wen Tiejun of the School of Agricultural Economics and Rural Development at Renmin University invited me to his colloquia whenever I was in Beijing, and the practical support he, his colleagues and his students offered made my field research in Sichuan possible. That research has formed the basis for this book, so I am greatly indebted to all who generously allowed me to live among them as an ethnographer and especially everyone in the ecological village that I will call Daxi and those in the connected food network. Here an ethical dilemma emerges: anonymization conflicts with acknowledging these crucial contributors by name. I will thank them, using the pseudonyms by which readers will get to know them. I am grateful to the government of Qiuling Township for facilitating my research – especially agronomist Dong Jie, who arranged my stay and often invited me to accompany him to work, as well as Village Party Secretary Wang Zhaochen, Village Leader Kang Sunbin and all the Villagers' Committee members and group leaders – especially Wang Yiyou and Lei Wenfeng – for inviting me to meetings and other events. Last but not least, I thank Lei Wenyong, Chen Yongmin and their family for their hospitality, their patience with my questions and for becoming, like Luo Hongying, great teachers of Sichuanese.

Back in Vienna, the CaSt network – a group of anthropologists interested in the relational co-constitution of care and the state organized by Tatjana Thelen – has proved very inspirational and productive for drafting the book. I learned a great deal discussing my work in progress with Anna Ellmer, Ilona Grabmaier, Nina Haberland, Evangelos Karagiannis, Brigitte Möller, Marlene Persch, Deniz Seebacher, Milo Strauss, Andreas Streinzer and André Thiemann. I also received valuable feedback from my colleagues Volha Biziukova, Cansu Civelek, Daniele Karasz, Katrin Kremmel, Melanie Sindelar and Alexandra Sindrestean and benefited from discussing earlier drafts at various occasions with Chris Hann, Thomas Kirsch, Erdmute Alber, Irtefa Binte-Farid, Julia Eckert, Stefan Hirschauer, Susan McKinnon, Klaus Schlichte, Martin Sökefeld, Sabine Strasser and participants of the EASA Network on Anthropologies of the State and the Regional Group China(s) of the German Anthropological Association. While too many people read one or more draft chapters to list them all, special thanks are due to Tatjana Thelen, who read the entire book not just once but many times, always with great attention and invaluable feedback. During the final revisions, my colleagues in science and technology studies at Klagenfurt, especially Julia Malik and Miriam Fahimi, helped me to develop what has become the book's core argument more clearly. Three reviewers provided helpful comments for improving the manuscript. Finally, Daniel Flaumenhaft's thorough language editing greatly improved the final form of this book.

Engaging with these people to produce this book would not have been possible without support outside of academic life. I am grateful to my family, especially my parents Monika and Josef, and friends, for backing me in manifold ways. The initial drafts would never even have left the safe space of my computer had Eva not read through them first and encouraged me to share them with others, and I thank her above all not only for the time she shared with me and the book but for accepting that I had less time to share with her, Balduin, Ephraim and Adam. Thank you for being so incredibly supportive.
